

GRILLY'S DESCENT FROM ARTIFICIAL TO SIMPLE LIFE.—In his last overland letter, Mr. Greeley remarks: "I believe I have now descended the ladder of artificial life nearly to its lowest round. If the Cheneys—thirty of whom stopped the last express down on the route we must traverse, and tried to beg or steal from it—should see fit to capture and strip us, we should of course have further experience in the same line; but for the present the progress I have made during the last fortnight, toward the primitive simplicity of human existence, may be roughly noted thus:

May 15th—Chicago—Chocolate and morning newspapers last seen on the breakfast table.

23rd—Leavenworth—Room bells and bath last seen in their appearance.

24th—Topeka—Beefsteak and wash bowls (other than tin) last visible. Barber ditto.

25th—Manhattan—Potatoes and eggs last recognized among the blessings that "brighten as they take their flight." Chairs ditto.

27th—Junction City—Last visitation of a boardwalk, with dissolving views of a board bed room. Chairs bid us goodbye.

28th—Tipe Creek—Benches for seats at meals have disappeared, giving place to bags and boxes. We (two passengers of a scribbling turn) write our letters in the express wagon that has borne us by day and night to our lodgings for the night. Thunder and lightning from both south and west give strong promise of a shower before morning. Dubious looks at several holes in the canvas covering of the wagon. Our trust is in buoyant hearts and an India-rubber blanket. Good night.
